The World's Only Automated External Defibrillators (AED) to be Type Approved for the Marine Environment

According to the World Health Organisation (WHO), sudden cardiac arrest (SCA) is one of the world's biggest killers, killing over 3 million people worldwide last year. Even on land the chances of the emergency services reaching a victim in time are slim, at sea the chances are zero.

The only proven way to treat SCA is by delivering an electric shock to the heart to restore a normal heart rhythm. This is called defibrillation and can make the difference between saving a life and having a victim die. If a victim receives defibrillation within the vital first 3 minutes the chances of survival are increased by up to a staggering 70%.
